Sam- Wk 2 "I'm Real Mad. Also Expectations."	*EMOTIONAL RESPONSE *Jarred by inequality between two settings *Sam's deterritorialization leads to peer deterritorialization *Role of professor (JR) in deterritorialization	I'm just real mad about educational inequality today. So I was very uncomfortable in the space of [private school] b/c it's so great and it's unfair that only certain people who can pay tuition can do it . . . they just have no idea that they are so lucky. So I'm just very mad and I cried earlier because I'm very mad. Other than that, pedagogically I think we can do a little better about communicating expectations and modeling it . . . as a reminder- proximity really really works and also maybe we should break them into smaller groups b/c we had an issue with podcasts not having a great dynamic . . . we can fun, but we need to have it in a structured way. That's a weird thing to come from Middleberry .. it's weird to remember that it is normal in a K-12 classroom but that's kinda where they are, where there brains are . they don't have the same self regulation things going on now because they are small and we are large.	JR- YES. TRIPLE YES. We just chatted, but for the benefit of everyone- the fact that you are in both a placement at [private school] and a placement at Middleberry is no accident. I think it's incredibly important to look across contexts side-by-side and think about horrible, yucky, uncomfortable questions like "WHY DO ONLY RICH KIDS GET A REALLY COOL SCIENCE LAB?!" Yes there are scholarships. Yes not everyone at [private school] is rich. But the fact remains- there are gross differences in the way kids at both institutions are treated and the types of doors that will fly open for them. I think being angry is the only appropriate response. KS- Hey dude. So yeah- the pedagogy thing .. going over expectations . . . that's definitely a must . . . that we are currently in the process of fixing. . . yeah I understand that you're mad and I guess I didn't think to look at it that way . . . because I'm in three diff placements that are so crazy different but I agree with Dr. Rust that being mad is the only appropriate response. . . the fact that you're agitated about it is great, even if that's weird to say . . . it's good that we're in these placements because we get to see how these things work at every site . . . PS-You really catch my heart and attention within the first thirty seconds dude. I did not even think about how nice St. Andrews has it until you mentioned it....wow.....i mean wow... MP-Yep. Expectations are hard. I feel like I know these kids really well, and I still have no idea what I'm doing or what to tell them. Also, private education is super weird to me, because if I was parent, I would pay anything to ensure that my child gets the best education, but as a teacher I'm all like, "EDUCATION SHOULD NOT BE SOMETHING WE PAY A SHIT TON FOR!!" Rant over. JA- Oh my gosh! So true! I never really thought about it until you mentioned it. I went to a school like [private school] and I definitely took for granted everything I had in that school!
